The Nation

(Founded 1865)

for fifty years a force in American Literature

TO-DAY, as fifty years ago, THE NATION stands for what is best in American life, American politics, and American literature. It is the organ of thinking people, the exponent of sane progress, of wise Conservatism. Its first list of contributors in July 1865, contained the names of Henry W. Longfellow, John G. Whittier, and James Russell Lowell, and to-day, as then, the foremost men of the country, in all fields of human activity, write for its columns. European authorities of equal rank are among its regular contributors. For fifty years thousands of young men have acquired through THE NATION what many of its admirers have termed a true "university education." Nothing is foreign to its columns that widens the intellectual outlook and promotes good citizenship.

Fifty Years of American Idealism

Edited by GUSTAV POLLAK

A Handsome Quarto Volume Recently Published by Houghton Mifflin & Co.

Many of the articles contained in the volume have a direct bearing on the burning questions of to-day. Among these may be mentioned Carl Schurz's "Responsible Government in Germany," E. L. Godkin's "Neutrals and Contraband" and "The Morality of Arms-Dealing," and various editorials on such subjects as "The Austro-Prussian War and the Rights of Private Property," "The Meaning of American Naturalization," "American Diplomats Abroad," "American Sympathies During the Franco-Prussian War," "Our Duty to Mexico," and "A Spirited Foreign Policy." The book tells the story of THE NATION and its writers, and is virtually a condensed political history of the last fifty years.

In order to secure new readers THE NATION is pleased to offer a copy of "Fifty Years of American Idealism" with a year's subscription for $4.20.
